Report on Celebration of 1st National Space Day on 29.08.2024

On the occasion of the 1st National Space Day, the Department of Physics organized a one-day seminar on 29.08.2024 to commemorate India's historic achievement in space exploration—the successful landing of Chandrayaan-3 near the Moon's south pole. The event aimed to spread awareness among students about India's growing capabilities in space science and to inspire young minds toward careers in astronomy and space research. The program was inaugurated by watering a plant. The seminar featured two distinguished speakers. Dr. Tamal Basak, Assistant Professor, Indian Centre for Space Physics, delivered an insightful talk on “Chandrayaan-3: India's Lunar Leap.” He explained the mission's objectives, technical challenges, and its significance in placing India among the top space-faring nations. Dr. Dusmanta Patra, Postdoctoral Fellow, S. N. Bose National Centre for Basic Sciences, presented a fascinating lecture on “Listening to the Universe with Radio Astronomy.” He discussed how radio telescopes help scientists explore distant cosmic phenomena like pulsars, quasars, and black holes. The seminar was followed by a student quiz competition, organized by Dr. Sujay Pal, based on topics related to space science, astronomy, and Indian space missions. The enthusiastic participation of students reflected their keen interest. Prizes were awarded to the top three performers to encourage academic curiosity and engagement. The program concluded with a vote of thanks from the Dr. Sujay Pal, Head of the Department. Around 23 students and 22 faculty members participated in this programme. The celebration not only honoured India's scientific milestones but also ignited a passion for space research among students.

Descriptive Analysis

- In these cases, we can use single numbers called summary statistics to describe characteristics of a data set.
- Two of these characteristics are particularly important to decision makers: central tendency and dispersion.
- Central Tendency: It is the middle point of a distribution. Measures of central tendency are also called measures of location. In figure below, the central location of curve B lies to the right of those of curve A and curve C. Notice that the central location of curve A is equal to that of curve C.

- Dispersion It is the spread of the data in a distribution, that is, the extent to which the observations are scattered. Notice that curve A in Figure 3-2 has a wider spread, or dispersion, than curve B.

12 DAY ONLINE INTERNATIONAL FACULTY DEVELOPMENT PROGRAME ON INTERDISCIPLINARY RESEARCH IN SOCIAL SCIENCE AND HUMANITIES FROM 19TH MAY TO 31ST MAY.

REPORT ON SESSION 2 OF FACULTY DEVELOPMENT PROGRAMME (28TH MAY 2025)

Session 2: 4:00 pm-6:00 pm.

Resource Person: Dr. Manas Prati Borah.

Topic: Research Ethics in Humanities.

1. Program Overview: This report details the session conducted on the ninth day of a 12-day International Faculty Development Program. The session, focused on the critical topic of "Research Ethics in Humanities."

2. Speaker and Topic: The session featured an insightful discussion led by Dr. Manash Pratim Borah, who presented on "Research Ethics in Humanities". Dr. Borah demonstrated remarkable dedication by delivering his talk, underscoring the paramount importance of ethical conduct in academic and professional spheres, particularly in collaborative research. He highlighted the notable scarcity of resources pertaining to research ethics specifically tailored for the humanities, in contrast to the more abundant materials available for social sciences.

3. Key Discussion Points and Insights:

Dr. Borah's presentation delved into several crucial aspects of research ethics:

- Four Norms of Research Ethics: Dr. Bora systematically outlined four fundamental norms that govern research ethics: truth norms, methodological norms, institutional norms, and common norms.
- Truth Norms in Humanities: He elaborated on the inherent challenges in discerning truth within the humanities, attributing this difficulty to the researcher's intrinsic ideological framework, which can inadvertently introduce bias into interpretations. He posited that ideology can transcend narrow perspectives when it acknowledges societal conflicts rather than perceiving society as a monolithic entity.

- Truth and Reality: A significant emphasis was placed on the concrete and deeply interconnected nature of truth with reality in humanities, asserting its non-abstract quality. Dr. Bora referenced Shakespeare's Hamlet to illustrate the vastness of reality beyond philosophical conceptions.
- Practice and Immediate Reality: He advocated for humanities research to maintain a close engagement with immediate reality, moving beyond exclusive reliance on library-based studies. He critiqued the tendency towards over-theorization in certain humanities disciplines, which can lead to a detachment from contemporary societal issues.
- Ethical Behavior in Competition: Dr. Borah offered valuable advice to researchers, particularly those at the nascent stages of their careers, on upholding intellectual honesty and ethical conduct amidst competitive pressures and the pursuit of recognition or financial gain.
- Institutional and Common Norms: He expounded on how institutional norms are instrumental in ensuring that research remains open, collaborative, independent, and critical. The common norms, stemming from societal demands, prioritize human dignity, safeguarded by principles such as respect for equality, freedom, autonomy, and justice.
- Negative Capability: A notable concept introduced was John Keats' "negative capability," presented as a vital component of research ethics in the humanities. This concept entails maintaining an aesthetic distance from one's own ideologies and beliefs to objectively pursue truth.

4. Conclusion and Recommendations: Dr. Borah concluded by reiterating the imperative for research institutions to foster integrity, responsibility, and freedom of speech among researchers. This environment is crucial for the dissemination of reliable knowledge that ultimately contributes to the welfare of society. The program concluded with a vote of thanks to the resource person, participants, and organizing teams. After the session was over the participants were provided online feedback form and they were collected on the same day.

Recommendations for the College IQAC: Based on the insights from this FDP session, the IQAC may consider:

- Developing or enhancing workshops and training modules on research ethics specifically tailored for humanities faculty and research scholars.
- Encouraging interdisciplinary discussions and collaborations that bridge theoretical frameworks with immediate societal realities.
- Promoting a research culture that prioritizes intellectual honesty and ethical conduct over competitive pressures.
- Reviewing existing institutional policies to ensure they adequately support open, collective, independent, and critical research, while upholding human dignity.

Report on the Session: “Primary and Secondary Data in Social Science Research”

Date: Day 8 (Second Half), 12-Day Online International Faculty Development Programme

Time: 04:00 PM – 06:00 PM

Speaker: Dr. Jayanta Sen, Professor of Economics, Department of Economics, West Bengal State University

Session Coordinator: Ms. Oindrila Roy

Organised by: Srikrishna College and Birangana Sati Sadhanirajyik Viswavidyalay, Assam

On the second half of Day 8 of the 12-day Online International Faculty Development Programme, an insightful session was conducted on the topic “Primary and Secondary Data in Social Science Research” The session was delivered by Dr. Jayanta Sen, Professor of Economics at West Bengal State University.

Dr. Sen began the session by discussing the basic types of research in the social sciences, such as exploratory, descriptive, analytical, and applied research, explaining how each plays a different role in contributing to academic and policy knowledge. He introduced participants to the research process, beginning with identifying a research problem, formulating questions, reviewing literature, choosing a research area, and finally selecting appropriate data collection and analysis techniques.

A key part of the session was dedicated to understanding primary and secondary data. Dr. Sen clearly defined the two: primary data being data collected directly from the field through surveys, interviews, and experiments, while secondary data refers to data already collected and available through reports, academic publications, or government databases. He spoke about their advantages and limitations, and provided examples from economic and social research to explain when and why one might be chosen over the other.

The speaker also elaborated on the role of qualitative methods, especially within field-based social science research, highlighting techniques such as interviews, focus group discussions, case studies, and participant observation. He explained how qualitative data provides depth and context to social behaviour and cultural practices, which often cannot be captured through quantitative methods alone.

In terms of reasoning approaches, Dr. Sen discussed inductive and deductive methods of research. He explained that inductive reasoning moves from specific observations to broader generalizations and theories, and is common in qualitative research. In contrast, deductive reasoning starts with a theory or hypothesis and tests it through structured data collection, usually in quantitative studies. He stressed the importance of aligning the research approach with the research question and data type.

The session also touched upon ethical considerations in research, including the integrity of data, informed consent, and transparency in analysis and reporting.

In the concluding part of the session, a question-and-answer segment allowed participants to engage with the speaker on topics such as sampling techniques, integrating mixed methods, and challenges in fieldwork. Dr. Sen responded thoughtfully, linking theoretical concepts to practical applications.

Overall, the session was rich in both methodological knowledge and practical guidance, offering participants a holistic understanding of data, research design, and the broader research process. Dr. Sen's structured presentation and clear explanations made the session highly beneficial for faculty and early-career researchers.

Report on the Session: “Gender Equity and Culture Studies”

Date: Day 3 (Second Half)

Time: 04:00 PM – 06:00 PM

Speaker: Dr. Anita Singh, Professor, Department of English, Banaras Hindu University, Varanasi

Session Coordinator: Ms. Oindrila Roy

Organised under: 12-Day Online International Faculty Development Programme by Srikrishna College and Birangana Sati Sadhanirajyik Viswavidyalay, Assam

The afternoon session on “Gender Equity and Culture Studies”, held from 4:00 PM to 6:00 PM, was a compelling exploration of feminist thought and the history of women's activism in India. The speaker, Dr. Anita Singh, Professor in the Department of English at Banaras Hindu University, brought critical insight to the topic, drawing from both theory and real-world movements that have shaped the discourse on gender in the Indian context.

Dr. Singh began her lecture by quoting Judith Butler from Notes Toward a Performative Theory of Assembly, setting the tone for a deeply reflective and analytical discussion on the politics of identity, voice, and visibility in feminist movements. Using Butler's idea of collective action and assembly, she framed the conversation around how voices come together in public spaces to demand justice, particularly in the context of women's rights.

She then provided a historical overview of feminist movements in India, tracing their roots from the colonial period to the post-independence era. Through various case histories and examples, Dr. Singh illustrated how grassroots movements, legal interventions, and sustained activism led to significant changes in laws and in society's perception of gender-based oppression. Cases like the protests following the Mathura rape case, the Shah Bano judgment, and movements around domestic violence laws were discussed as landmarks in the Indian feminist journey.

Dr. Singh also explored the intersections between women's movements and other social justice movements, such as Dalit rights, environmental activism, and peasant movements. She emphasized that feminism in India is not a single stream but a network of interconnected struggles shaped by caste, class, religion, and region.

The session concluded with a question-and-answer segment, where participants raised thoughtful questions about feminist theory, policy impact, and the role of education in promoting gender equity. Dr. Singh responded with clarity, offering scholarly insight along with practical reflections.

Overall, the session was an enriching experience that helped participants critically engage with feminist theory and its real-world applications. Dr. Singh's blend of academic depth and activist perspective made the session especially valuable for educators and researchers aiming to incorporate gender perspectives into their teaching and scholarship.

Date 19.05.2025

This is the first session of FDP held on 19th May 2025. This faculty development programme was jointly organised by Sri Krishna College, Bagula, Nadia and Birangana Sati Sadhani Rajyik Vidyalaya, Assam. The first session of this FDP was co-ordinate by Dr Poulomi Ray, faculty of department of Bengali of Shri Krishna College.

Dr. Debashish Nandi was the speaker of this session. Dr. Nandi is an associate professor in the Department of Political science at Kazi Nazrul University, Asansol West Bengal .

Dr Nandi is a visiting faculty member of various reputed universities of the world like Tazik National University ( Tajikistan 2022), department of Japanese studies at University of Dhaka, Bangladesh, Frankfurt University of applied sciences Frankfurt ,Germany ,St.Petersburg state University Russia.

He has conducted almost seven research project like-

- Balochistan movement in Pakistan: a quest for autonomy
- Illegal Bangladeshi migrant in bordering district of West Bengal
- Japanese culinary industry business in South Asia: possibilities and challenges .

All are sponsored by world reputed organisations; he has written 8 books as author and coauthor; he also has 14 edited books, 85 book chapters and 65 journal articles from reputed National and international publishing houses.

In this session Dr. Nandi delivered his lecture on the topic of 'Research Methodology and Content Analysis'

This was the most valuable lecture in this faculty development programme.

As per Dr. Nandi

- social science is always a very touchy subject, so research methodology cannot be mechanical but more human.
- Researcher observation is the most important part of research. They always use the eye of the third person, not the first person.
- No emotion should reflect in the research. We should be very natural when we choose our topic because everything nowadays people can read or see, so they judge the researcher as his or her work.
- The Researcher should be a very good observer .Whatever they observe, what context he or she got, what proof they have, they must go through this and it must be very analytical.
- Statement , quote field work on our considered as a primary document.
- Content can come from different manners after collection of data research should go through it very analytically.
- Reference of the research work must be authenticated. Researcher is not an authority, so they should give more and more references to justify their point.
- Argument is the most important part of the research without argument,a research is not considered as a good research.

- Research should mention the methodology it can be quantity or quality but they should mention the methodology of the research work on their research paper
- Mixed methodology is common in social science research
- Nowadays most of the research is interdisciplinary. Content can be changed depending on discipline. For example we can take Rabindranath Tagore's Gitanjali. Nowadays it is not considered only as a literary work, this reference can be used in different ways in literature, political science, economics and many other subjects.
- Into disciplinary approach is one of the very important tools in current research technique and this mentality research has to develop on its own.
- Researchers always maintain the research ethics.
- Upgraded data is very important for a research work
- More and more data researchers have to choose according to their topic. More data and less data both are difficult for research work.
- Before choosing a unique topic, researchers must be conscious about their sources, because bibliography is a very important part of research.
- If any researcher use any newspaper or magazine or ebooks they must submit the link for the reference.
- But whatever reference researchers use in their research work they must go through it because so many time reports are manipulative. Researchers should be very careful about their references.

In this way a good research work can be completed and absolutely it makes a new path of research.

The session was ended with the vote of thanks by the section coordinator .

Session Overview

The FDP session on "Quantitative Data Collection in Social Science Research" was organized with the objective of enriching the methodological competencies of faculty and researchers involved in empirical social research. The session provided a comprehensive understanding of qualitative data collection with equipping participants with tools, strategies, and ethical considerations for conducting rigorous qualitative studies in field settings. Theoretical insights were coupled with practical guidance on the application of various data collection methods in the field, especially within the Indian context.

Session Objectives

- To understand different types of qualitative data collection tools.
- To learn about field-based data gathering techniques.
- To identify qualitative variables and determine appropriate measurement scales.
- To integrate national-level datasets like NSS, NFHS, and ISDS into qualitative analysis.
- To apply triangulation and evaluation methods for ensuring data reliability

Highlights of the Session ( Key Areas Covered in the discussion)

1. Identification of Variables in Qualitative Research

The session began by emphasizing on the process of identifying independent, dependent, and control variables for quantitative studies. These variables must be measurable, and operational definitions were emphasized to ensure clarity. Participants were also guided on how qualitative variables differ from quantitative ones, focusing on concepts, themes, narratives, and behaviors. These variables often emerge inductively during data collection and analysis rather than being fixed in advance.

2. Data Collection on the Field

The session explored how quantitative field data is collected using structured surveys, questionnaires, and field experiments. Field conditions, sampling plans, and enumerator training were also discussed. Practical techniques for fieldwork were discussed in depth, including participant observation, field interviews, and ethnographic immersion. The importance of cultural sensitivity and relationship-building in the field was underscored.

3. Types of Data Collection Methods

Participants were introduced to various quantitative data collection techniques: Surveys/questionnaires (structured and semi-structured), Structured observation, Census and government databases, Digital self-administered tools. Emphasis was placed on collecting data directly from respondents using pre-designed tools in real-world settings. Discussions included: Training enumerators, Ensuring data quality and ethical compliance, Using e-tools for data capture

4. Structured, Semi-Structured, and Unstructured Tools in Quantitative Research

• Structured Tools

These include fully standardized tools such as closed-ended questionnaires, MCQ formats, Likert scales, and ranking tasks. They are ideal for statistical generalization and minimize bias.

• Semi-Structured Tools

Although less common in pure quantitative designs, they may include a mix of closed-ended and few open-ended questions to capture numerical data with context. Useful in pre-survey assessments or institutional evaluations.

• Unstructured Tools

Not typically used for quantitative data, but can be incorporated during instrument development. For example, initial exploratory conversations or observations might inform the design of a structured tool.

5. Cross-Sectional Data and Multiple Methods

The utility of cross-sectional data in qualitative research—particularly when collecting data at a single time point from different groups—was explored, especially in understanding social perceptions and group behaviors.(e.g. health surveys, income levels etc ). The resource person stressed the use of diverse methods such as in-depth interviews, focus group discussions (FGDs), and observation. Employing multiple data collection methods ensures comprehensive understanding and greater validity of research findings. Combining surveys and structured observations enhances data depth and reliability.

6. Structural Approach to quantitative Research

A structured and systematic framework suggested steps with maintaining data protocols were highlighted involving clear stages such as tool design, sampling, field entry, data collection, and analysis. A step-by-step framework was introduced:

- Define research questions/hypotheses.
- Select variables and measurement levels.

- Choose appropriate tools and formats.
- Conduct a pilot survey.
- Implement full-scale data collection using standardized procedures.

7. Importance of a Pilot Survey

Conducting a pilot survey was recommended to pretest research tools, improve question formulation, and identify potential challenges in the field. This step helps refine the methodology before actual data collection begins. The key factors of pilot survey are following,

- To check clarity, logic, and flow of the instrument.
- To identify and correct ambiguities or response bias.
- To validate scaling and time estimation for full deployment.

8. Focus Group Utility

FGDs were presented as an effective technique for understanding group norms, shared values, and collective opinions. Guidelines for forming diverse and balanced groups, and tips for moderating discussions, were provided. Focus Group Utility. Though typically qualitative, focus groups can be instrumental during the tool development phase in quantitative research: Identifying relevant items for surveys. Understanding terminology and framing Testing question logic.

9. Scale of Measurement

Understanding scales is essential for selecting statistical tools and interpreting data accurately. Measurement levels were discussed in detail:

- Nominal: Categories without order (e.g., religion, region).
- Ordinal: Categories with a meaningful order but unknown intervals (e.g., socioeconomic status, satisfaction ranking).
- Interval: Ordered categories with equal intervals but no true zero (e.g., temperature in Celsius).
- Ratio: Interval scale with a meaningful zero (e.g., income, number of children). Though qualitative data is largely textual and narrative, nominal and ordinal scales can be used to categorize responses (e.g., themes, ranks, levels of satisfaction), assisting in organizing and interpreting the data.

10. Triangulation of Methods

Triangulation—using multiple sources, researchers, or methods—was discussed as a strategy to enhance the credibility of findings. Methodological triangulation (e.g., combining FGDs and interviews) was illustrated with case examples. Although traditionally associated with qualitative studies, triangulation in quantitative research involves:

- Combining primary and secondary sources
- Cross-verifying with existing datasets (e.g., NSS or NFHS)

- Using different tools to measure the same variable (e.g., self-report and administrative data)

11. Evaluation and Sources of Data and Sample Size Determination

The session addressed evaluation methods such as: Descriptive and inferential statistical analysis, Reliability and validity testing, Data cleaning and standardization Sources discussed included:

- Primary data: Original data collected directly from respondents
- Secondary data: Government surveys like NSS, NFHS, ISDS, Census of India
- The role of large-scale secondary datasets like NSSO (National Sample Survey Office), NFHS (National Family Health Survey), and ISDS (Indian Social Development Survey) was discussed in triangulating field data, identifying research gaps, and providing macro-level insights for contextual framing.

Participants learned to distinguish between primary data collected through field tools and secondary data from established datasets. How to use structured observation in settings like classrooms or workplaces to quantify behaviors. These datasets were presented as useful for large-scale trend analysis, benchmarking, and policy evaluation. Therefore, sample size was also discussed in the context of: Population size, confidence level, and margin of error. Also use of statistical formulas for proportion and mean-based studies and a short introduction of Tools and calculators to assist researchers also highlighted.

Participant Engagement

The session was highly interactive, involving group activities, design of sample tools, and discussion of real-life field scenarios. Participants appreciated the clarity in explaining complex methodological issues and the practical relevance of shared case examples.

Conclusion

The session successfully addressed the principles and practices of quantitative data collection in social science research. Participants gained clarity on selecting appropriate tools—structured, semi-structured, and (occasionally) unstructured—and aligning them with measurement scales and research objectives. Emphasis on pilot surveys, field readiness, and the effective use of national-level datasets added practical value.

Faculty members left with a robust understanding of data integrity, tool design, and sampling, which they can apply to future academic and policy research.

Session Overview

As part of the Faculty Development Programme in Social Sciences, a special session was held on the topic "Data Collection and Techniques in the Field of Archaeology." The session was designed to equip faculty and research scholars with foundational and advanced knowledge in archaeological fieldwork, scientific dating techniques, and the interdisciplinary nature of archaeological research. The session provided a deep dive into the evolution of archaeological methods, from the beginning of excavation practices to the use of modern-day technologies. The discussion emphasis was placed on practical methodologies and theoretical frameworks that guide both historical reconstructions and current interpretations. A special focus was placed on archaeological contributions from the Indian subcontinent, along with comparative insights from global archaeological traditions such as biblical archaeology.

Session Objectives

- To introduce the stages of archaeological fieldwork, including excavation and artifact analysis.
- To understand stratigraphic and dating methods, including carbon dating.
- To highlight biblical archaeology and its methodology.
- To connect archaeology with anthropology for a holistic understanding of ancient societies.
- To examine significant archaeological discoveries in India and their historical implications.
- To discuss the role of archaeology in decolonization and modern historical reconstruction.
- To understand the evolution of excavation practices and scientific approaches to data collection.

Key Themes Covered

1. Beginning of Excavation

The session started with a historical overview of archaeological excavation:

- Early antiquarian excavations focused on treasure hunting and monumental architecture.
- The emergence of systematic excavation techniques in the 19th century brought methodological rigor.
- Influential excavations such as at Pompeii, Troy, and the Indus Valley initiated modern archaeological methods based on careful data collection and stratification.

Thorough explanation of the preliminary steps involved in an excavation, such as:

- Site identification through surveys, remote sensing, and historical records.
- Preparation of excavation plans, grid systems, and securing excavation permits.
- Importance of ethical practices and collaboration with local communities.

2. Stratigraphic Observation

Participants learned about stratigraphy—the analysis of different layers of soil and sediment to determine the chronological order of human activity. The invention and development of stratigraphic observation revolutionized archaeology:

- First systematically applied in the 19th century by scholars like Mortimer Wheeler.
- Helped in identifying sequential layers (strata) of human activity.
- Allowed archaeologists to establish relative chronology and site formation processes. Enabled precise documentation of contexts, leading to more accurate historical reconstructions.
- Use of tools like profile drawings and soil sampling in recording stratigraphy.
- Interpretation of deposition patterns to reconstruct settlement history.

3. Before and After Carbon Dating

The transition from traditional dating methods to scientific techniques was a major discussion point. The session elaborated on dating methods used in archaeology:

- Before carbon dating: Chronology was based on typology, historical texts, and stratigraphy.
- After carbon dating (introduced in the 1940s):
  - Radiocarbon dating allowed the dating of organic materials.
  - Made it possible to establish absolute dates for archaeological finds.
  - Enhanced accuracy in interpreting prehistoric and protohistoric remains.
  - Often used in conjunction with stratigraphy and thermoluminescence for corroboration.

- Limitations, calibration, and integration with other scientific methods like thermoluminescence and dendrochronology were also discussed.

4. Biblical Archaeology

A segment of the session introduced biblical archaeology, which attempts to link archaeological findings with narratives in biblical texts, its scope, and challenges:

- Aimed at discovering and validating archaeological evidence in relation to biblical texts.
- Examples included excavations
- Raised debates about objectivity, faith-based interpretation, and evidence-based research.
- A comparative look at how religious texts and archaeology interact in Indian cultural studies was also presented.

5. Relationship Between Archaeology and Anthropology

The session highlighted the interdisciplinary link between archaeology and anthropology:

- Archaeology as a sub-field of cultural anthropology, dealing with material remains.
- Archaeology contributes to cultural anthropology by interpreting material remains. How anthropological theories support interpretation of artifacts, social structures, cultural practices and economic systems.
- Integration of ethnographic parallels to interpret ancient societies. Case studies in ethnoarchaeology were used to show how modern tribal societies help interpret ancient behavior.

6. Indian Context in Archaeology

The resource person presented several major Indian archaeological discoveries and their importance:

a. Arikamedu Excavation

- Located in Tamil Nadu, Arikamedu revealed evidence of Indo-Roman trade.
- Findings include Roman amphorae, glass beads, and coins.
- Demonstrated India's involvement in early maritime trade routes.

b. Takshashila (Taxila)

- Excavations revealed structures of one of the world's oldest centers of learning.
- Showcased urban planning, Buddhist stupas, and Indo-Greek influence.

c. Dholavira

- A prominent Indus Valley Civilization site.

- Known for advanced town planning, water reservoirs, and a unique Harappan script signboard.
- Offers significant data on Harappan urbanism and environmental adaptation.

d. Harappan Method

- Refers to a systematic approach in excavating Harappan sites.
- Focuses on grid-based excavation, detailed stratigraphy, and material culture classification.

- Study of colonial architecture, fortifications, and altered landscapes.
- Role of archaeology in challenging Eurocentric historical narratives.
- Postcolonial interpretations of suppressed or rewritten histories.

11. Modern-Day Archaeology

The concluding segment focused on innovations in contemporary archaeology, including:

- Technological tools: use of LIDAR, drones, 3D modeling, GIS and remote sensing in reconstructing ancient landscapes.
Example: Reconstruction of Shakespeare's Globe Theatre in modern-day London with original foundations unearthed using urban archaeology techniques.
